This may help you pass your driving test the first time...

It's never easy to take your driving test for the first time, but it's even worse when you have to go through the experience again and again.

As the number of learner drivers passing their test the first time drops, it's clear that the tests are getting more difficult and that learners need to work harder if they want to achieve their dreams of being able to drive a car wherever and whenever they want.

If you're planning on taking your driving test later this year, then read on to find a selection of practical tips that will help you to boost your chances of passing the first time you take it.

Hire An Experienced Local Driving Instructor

When choosing a driving instructor, it's vital that you find someone who combines local knowledge with extensive experience in helping learner drivers to pass their test. You should easily be able to find an instructor local to you with a quick google search. For instance, if you are in the Milton Keynes area, then a simple search such as "Driving lessons in Milton Keynes" will bring you to driving school's like Pass4You.co.uk that could be your perfect choice. As you can see on their website, they have a 90% first-time pass rate which is something you should look out for when making your decision. This will help to maximise your chances of earning your driving license in 2020.

Make Sure You Practice On The Roads You'll Be Taking Your Test On

A local driving instructor with experience in helping local people to pass their test is essential because they will know which roads instructors will take you on in your area. They will be able to help you to learn about these roads so that you're not surprised when you take your test on them. Ask them to take you out on the roads that are close to your local driving test centre, so that you can boost your chances of passing your test the first time.

Don't Overlook The Theory Test

Many driving students believe that the theory test is easy, and that the practical is the only part of the test that you have to prepare for. However, the theory is a vital part of your test, and if you fail, then you won't be able to take your practical exam. Make sure you work hard to pass the theory test by studying the latest books and learning materials on the market.

They will contain up to date information so that you can pass your theory test and get on with the exciting process of passing the practical.

Practice Outside Of Your Lessons

Driving lessons with a professional instructor are crucial, but you also need to practice outside of your lessons. Think of it as homework; it helps you to enhance your knowledge and keep up your progress in between lessons with your instructor. Practice with a friend or family member who has had a licence for more than 3 years and is over 21 years old, so that you can get in as much practical, real-world driving experience before you take your test.

Learn About The Car You'll Be Taking Your Test In

Before you take your test, you need to learn the ins and outs of the car you will be driving. If you are using the car that you learned in, then this won't be very difficult. You are allowed to take your test in your own car if it meets the DVLA's criteria, or you could use your instructor's vehicle. If their car is different to the one you learned in, or you really want to use your own car but haven't driven it a lot, then make sure you practice in it before you take your test.

These tips should make it easier for you to pass your test, but at the end of the day, the most important factor is how hard you work. Commit yourself to your studies and practice extensively, and you should be able to achieve your goal and pass your test first time around.
